El Nino Or Not, November Marks Beginning Of Northwest's Flood Season

Thirty-Day Count Down for Flood Insurance?

SEATTLE, Wash. -- November marks the onset of rainy season in the Pacific Northwest, and this last week's steady rains have soaked roads and saturated soils. According to FEMA Acting Regional Director Dennis Hunsinger, it's time for policy holders to review their flood insurance policies and consider increasing coverage... and for uninsured homeowners and renters to think seriously about buying flood insurance.

"Our region is prone to a variety of natural disasters, ranging from seasonal flooding and winter storms to wildfires and earthquakes, but flooding is by far our leading cause of disaster-driven property loss," said Hunsinger. "National flood insurance offers a comprehensive safety net against future flood losses, and pays off whether or not there is a Presidential disaster declaration. But there is a thirty-day waiting period before the coverage takes effect, so do not wait until the water rises."

National Flood Insurance Program (NFIP) policies are available to communities that agree to adopt and enforce sound floodplain management practices, and according to Hunsinger, virtually every community in the northwest qualifies. "By aggressively managing their floodplains, local officials can guarantee access to affordable coverage, and that's important," said Hunsinger. "If you already have flood insurance - now is a good time to review your policy for adequate coverage. Keep it current - don't tempt fate by letting your policy lapse after a run of good weather."

Flood insurance covers structural damage and contents for all insurable residential and non-residential buildings. Policies can be purchased from any licensed insurance agent or broker. Maximum coverage for single-family homes is $250,000 for the structure itself, and $100,000 for contents. Renters can also insure their personal belongings for up to $100,000. Businesses can insure buildings for up to $500,000 for the structure, and contents for up to $500,000.
